Yvonne’s: five directions

One logo, one slogan, one pair of typefaces, and three recommended colour directions and two more that were also considered. Each is shown on its own cream and reversed on its main colour, in landscape and square, with the full palette underneath, followed by how to take it to a printer and test it with people.

01 · THE SLOGAN

Time-honoured recipes

Three lines were on the table. One of them does a different job from the other two, and that decides it.

Artisanal bakes	Tells a stranger what the business is. Useful, but it is a label rather than a slogan, and “artisanal” is the most worn-out word in food. Keep it as a small descriptor if ever needed, not as the line.
Traditionally crafted	Hits craftsmanship, but it is interchangeable with a hundred other bakeries and slightly stiff to say out loud.
Time-honoured recipes	The warmest of the three, the best rhythm, and the one that points at the real story: a handwritten cookbook passed from mother to daughter. Hyphenated, because “time-honoured” is one idea.

> Time-honoured recipes carries heritage and warmth without explaining itself. The new recipes still belong under it, because they are made the time-honoured way, in the same kitchen tradition.

A line to keep in reserve for packaging or social, if a second voice is ever wanted: Recipes worth handing down. It honours Yvonne’s recipes and quietly promises the new ones will earn the same place.

02 · THE TYPEFACES

A book face and a handwritten one

YVONNE'S

Libre Caslon for the name

Caslon is an eighteenth-century English book type, the face of old cookbooks, newspapers and shop fascias. Its strokes are sturdy rather than hairline, so the name survives being shrunk to a WhatsApp profile picture or printed on a box sticker. Set in spaced capitals, it reads as established and permanent, the way lettering over a shop door does.

Time-honoured recipes

Caveat for the slogan

Handwriting, not calligraphy. The earlier scripts looked like a wedding invitation; this looks like a note in the margin of a recipe. It stays legible at small sizes and gives the logo its warmth and human hand. The best version of this logo replaces it with a line in Yvonne's own handwriting, scanned from the cookbook.

The pairing is the idea in miniature: a formal, long-lived name above an informal, personal line. Quality and heritage from the serif; warmth and authenticity from the hand.

03 · THE COLOURS

Five directions, five colours each

Each direction is a small family rather than a single ink. Every family has the same five jobs, so whichever one is chosen, it is clear which colour goes where.

Main colour

The logo, headings and packaging. This is the colour people will remember.

Background

Most of every page, box and post. A cream chosen to suit that main colour.

Secondary

Panels, tissue paper and backgrounds for photos. A softer cousin of the main colour.

Accent

A small touch: a line, a stamp, a ribbon. Used sparingly, it is what catches the eye.

Text colour

Body text and fine print. A very dark shade, warmer and softer than black.

How much of each

Designers often balance a palette roughly 60, 30, 10: background most of the time, the main and secondary colours for about a third, and the accent for the last tenth. It is a rule of thumb, not a law, but it is why the accent should stay small.

One rule for words

Put words only in the main colour or the text colour. The secondary and accent colours are too light to read on the cream, so use them for shapes, lines and wrapping, never for writing. On a secondary-colour panel, write in the text colour.

THE TOP THREE

One warm, one cool, one natural

These three are the clearest to read and the most different from each other, so they make a fair choice. Each has a story a customer understands at a glance: a family cookbook, Delft pottery, a country kitchen.

OPTION A Burgundy #86363F on #F5EDE3

Traditional, elegant, established and warm. A lovely old family cookbook.

THE PALETTE

Burgundy	Warm ivory	Dusty blush	Antique caramel	Espresso
#86363F	#F5EDE3	#D8B9AC	#B98B62	#59463F
Main logo, headings, packaging	Main background, website	Secondary panels, tissue paper	Lines, borders and stamps, never words	Body text, fine print

THE INK

Jam, red wine, a leather-bound book. Burgundy is warm, rich and old, which is the whole brief in one colour. It is almost never used by home bakeries, so it is distinctive without trying to be.

THE FAMILY

Blush and caramel soften it into something you would wrap a cake in. Espresso, not black, keeps the small print warm.

REVERSED

Ivory lettering on burgundy is the strongest dark version of the five: it looks like foil-stamped packaging and suits ribbon, boxes and gift tags.

Best if the brand should feel warm first and distinctive second.

OPTION B

Delft blue

#2F4A86 on #F4F0E7

Classic, recognisable, slightly European and reminiscent of Delft pottery and vintage biscuit tins.

Delft blue

#2F4A86

Main logo, headings, packaging

Porcelain cream

#F4F0E7

Main background, website

Powder blue

#AABBD5

Secondary panels, tissue paper

Antique gold

#C6A36A

Small highlights, decorative details

Ink navy

#39465C

Body text, fine print

THE INK

The blue of Delft pottery and old enamel kitchenware. It is lively where navy is heavy, and it flatters golden-brown bakes by contrast.

THE FAMILY

Blue on a pale glaze, like the pottery itself. Antique gold adds the warmth that a blue brand needs next to food.

REVERSED

Cream on Delft blue looks like a painted shop sign or a tin of biscuits, and works well as a sticker on kraft paper.

Best if the brand should feel fresh and current while still looking like it has a history.

OPTION C

Heritage olive

#59634A on #F2EDE0

Natural, grounded, understated and traditional. A little more countryside kitchen than patisserie.

THE PALETTE

Heritage olive	Oatmeal ivory	Soft sage	Clay pot	Dark moss
#59634A	#F2EDE0	#ADB19A	#C17B5C	#424638
Main logo, headings, packaging	Main background, website	Secondary panels, tissue paper	Small highlights, decorative details	Body text, fine print

THE INK

Olive oil tins, kitchen-garden herbs, a farmhouse dresser. Quiet and earthy; it lets the bakes be the colour.

THE FAMILY

Oatmeal, sage and moss are all soft greens and greiges; the clay-pot accent is the spark that keeps it from feeling sleepy.

REVERSED

Oatmeal on olive is the most understated dark version: it suits a market stall, a recipe card or a linen bag.

Best if the brand should feel natural and unfussy rather than grand.

ALSO CONSIDERED

Two that did not make the top three

Both are good, and both are worth printing alongside the top three. Each one sits close to a direction above, which is why it came second. If people prefer one of these in testing, that is useful to know.

OPTION D Warm terracotta #995648 on #F5E9DC

Welcoming, handmade, delicious and personal. This direction feels particularly connected to baking.

THE PALETTE

Warm terracotta	Biscuit cream	Soft clay	Honey gold	Dark cocoa
#995648	#F5E9DC	#D9A18E	#C39A58	#55443B
Main logo, headings, packaging	Main background, website	Wrapping and panels without words	Small highlights, decorative details	Body text, fine print

THE INK

A baked crust, a clay oven, a flowerpot on the windowsill. The most edible-looking of the five, and the closest to the colour of the bakes themselves.

THE FAMILY

All warm, no cool colour anywhere: biscuit, clay, honey and cocoa. Cosy, but it sits nearest to the brown-and-kraft look many home bakeries already use.

WORTH KNOWING

A shade darker than first proposed (was #A65D4E), so small print is clear. Keep the logo on biscuit cream; on soft clay it fades.

Best if the brand should feel like the kitchen it comes from. Second to burgundy, which is close to it and less like other home bakeries.

OPTION E

Deep teal

#356373 on #F1EEE5

Refined, traditional and slightly more contemporary. Think vintage enamelware and an old-fashioned kitchen.

THE PALETTE

Deep teal	Soft porcelain	Sea glass	Muted brass	Deep slate
#356373	#F1EEE5	#A8C0BA	#C5A16B	#35484B
Main logo, headings, packaging	Main background, website	Secondary panels, tissue paper	Small highlights, decorative details	Body text, fine print

THE INK

Enamelware, old kitchen tiles, an apothecary jar. Deep teal is calm and confident rather than warm; the warmth comes from the brass, the handwriting and photographs of the bakes.

THE FAMILY

Porcelain is a cooler, greyer cream, which keeps the teal from looking muddy. Brass is the one warm note, so use it sparingly and it will shine.

REVERSED

Porcelain on teal has a mid-century grocer feel, like a painted tin or an old shop front.

Best if standing out matters more than feeling cosy. Second to Delft blue, which is close to it with a stronger story.

04 · TAKING IT TO THE PRINTER

Judge the colour on the real thing

A screen makes colour with light and a printer makes it with ink, so the same colour can come out duller or darker on paper. Decide only from the printer's proof, never from a phone or a home printer.

1. Bring this printout and the colour codes. Ask the printer to match each main colour to its nearest Pantone colour. The printer converts the colours on their own machines, so let them do it rather than bringing your own print numbers.
2. Ask for proofs on the actual material. The box board, the sticker paper, the kraft bag. Shiny paper, matte paper and brown kraft each change how a colour looks.
3. Print every direction on the same items. The same box and the same sticker for each, so the colour is the only thing that changes.
4. Look at the proofs in daylight, and in the light where the bakes will be sold.
5. Write down the Pantone codes the printer used for the winner, next to its colour codes, and ask for those same codes every time.

05 · TESTING IT WITH PEOPLE

Ask people who would buy from her

1. Show the printed packaging, not a screen. People react differently to a logo on a real box than to a picture of it.
2. Ask people like her customers. Friends and family are kind, not neutral. Customers and people who buy baked goods are the ones who count.
3. Put them all out together, in a different order for each person, and do not say which one you like.
4. Ask "Which one would you pick up, and why?" Not "Which looks more homely?", because naming a word nudges people towards it.
5. Then ask for three words from a list that mixes good and bad: warm, old-fashioned, elegant, dull, fresh, cheap, homemade, expensive. The words people choose say more than the vote.
6. Write down the reasons, not only the pick. Fifteen to thirty people is a sensible rough number: enough to see a pattern, not proof.

The establishment year is set to 2027 on every version and can be changed. The monogram stamp (a single Y in a double ring) and all exports are in the working canvas.

All five main colours clear the strictest contrast level for large lettering on their cream. The secondary and accent colours do not, which is why they are kept for shapes and wrapping rather than words.
